Special report
Companies with purpose:
The future of business

"Society is demanding that companies, both public and private, serve a social purpose. Companies must benefit all of their stakeholders, including shareholders, employees, customers, and the communities in which they operate."
— Larry Fink, chairman and chief executive officer of BlackRock

Why purpose?

To generate long-term value and maintain relevancy in today’s global economy, companies need to infuse purpose into their operations. Built on a commitment to core values, purpose is the underlying motivation for why a corporation exists as well as the driving force behind corporate actions. By establishing a standard framework for responsible corporate behavior and actions—a company’s values inform, motivate and catalyze decision-making. Purpose-based brand value propositions are now driving consumer purchasing decisions more than ever.

87% of customers state they purchase goods based on a company’s advocacy on social matters.

89% of U.S. shoppers are likely to switch to a cause-branded product when choosing between two brands of equal quality and price.¹

In short, an organization’s entire strategy is reflective of its sense of purpose. In order to execute a successful purpose-driven strategy, it is imperative for companies to consider what elements of corporate social responsibility resonate with their brand and consumers.

Purpose vs. profit

IBM’s Global Purpose Study, conducted by Morning Consult, found that 80% of global respondents agreed more strongly with the statement that corporations have a responsibility to prioritize their employees, the environment and their community as much as they prioritize delivering profits to their shareholders. Comparatively, only 8% of respondents agreed that corporations only have a responsibility to prioritize delivering profits to their shareholders.

4 out of 5 respondents globally say corporations should prioritize purpose as much as profit

This trend holds true globally (Reflective of total positive impact)

This trend holds true across each country surveyed individually. At least 71% of respondents in every country agreed that corporations should equally prioritize delivering profits with other considerations, and no more than 12% in any given country agreed that corporations only have a responsibility to prioritize delivering profits to their shareholders.

Respondents in Russia were most likely to agree that corporations have responsibilities beyond delivering profits to shareholders, with 91% agreeing with the more comprehensive statement. Respondents in Australia and India were the most likely to believe (12%) that corporations are only responsible to their shareholders.

In Australia (77%), Germany (72%) and Russia (87%), promoting quality jobs and skills is most helpful to corporate favorability.

In the UK (70%) delivering value to customers is most helpful to improving corporate favorability.

In China (70%), promoting diversity and inclusion is most helpful to improving corporate favorability.

Promoting diversity and inclusion is less likely to lead to an increase in favorability compared to other metrics in most nations, especially in Japan (31%) and Germany (45%).

When reviewing the data by country, there is more variance in the top drivers for business impact:

In particular, respondents in Russia (87%) and Mexico (87%) report being significantly more likely to do business with corporations that take specific action towards promoting quality jobs and skills.

Australia (71%) and India (79%) are more likely to conduct business with companies that support local communities.

Brazil (83%) and Spain (79%) care more about investing in employees.

Delivering value to customers takes precedence in Canada (81%), Japan (58%), UK (69%) and the US (70%).
When looking across all age groups, promoting jobs and skills remains highest driver of business (76%). When dissecting the results by generation, those 50 and over (80%) were most likely to be impacted in their business dealings by a company delivering value to customers, while promoting quality jobs and skills had the strongest impact on 18-29 year old respondents (72%) and 30-49 year old respondents’ (77%) likelihood to do business with a corporation.

Case studies

LEGO

When a partnership with a major oil company unexpectedly resulted in a PR crisis that put LEGO’s brand at risk, the company reclaimed its positive reputation by undertaking a series of sustainability goals in line with its corporate mission “to inspire and develop the builders of tomorrow.”

LEGO established strong partnerships with agencies like the World Wildlife Fund to execute sustainability initiatives that encompassed all aspects of the toymaker’s supply chain — including materials, production and packaging.

Informed by core values, Lego’s extensive investment in corporate social responsibility and commitment “to leave a positive impact on the planet, which future generations will inherit” ultimately allowed the beloved company to successfully rebuild its brand.

Patagonia

Companies and brands fail to execute corporate purpose when their core values and beliefs do not align with their behavior and actions. When purpose is used merely as a marketing tactic or advertising tagline, the lack of authenticity is transparent.

At Patagonia, the environmental stance is embedded into the culture. They have stated that when Patagonia has a job opening, all things being equal, they will hire the person “who’s committed to saving the planet no matter what the job is.”

Patagonia’s commitment to corporate social responsibility is fully integrated into its business model. In terms of corporate purpose strategy, Patagonia succeeds because it is “uniquely laser focused on the environment, not as a way to connect, but as a life-long commitment to why they exist.”

Purpose and Corporate Social Responsibility

Shifting business and consumer trends have led to an elevated interest in corporate social responsibility, a business practice where corporations hold themselves accountable to serve a social purpose and make a positive impact on their communities, the environment, and their employees.

Major employers are investing in their workers and communities because they know it is key to achieving long term success. From 2011 to 2018, the number of Fortune 500 companies publishing corporate social responsibility reports grew from under 20% to over 85%,⁵ signifying that companies are acknowledging and addressing corporate social responsibility as an escalating stakeholder priority. No longer is corporate social responsibility optional for companies; it is imperative to a company’s success. By capitalizing on corporate social responsibility, companies have much to gain by demonstrating their authentic and comprehensive focus on purpose.

Now more than ever, businesses are recognizing the tangible and intangible benefits of integrating corporate social responsibility with business. No matter where a company is on their purpose trajectory, there are three main ways corporate social responsibility can demonstrate an authentic and comprehensive purpose:

- Generate consumer loyalty
- Drive employee engagement
- Provide impact to stakeholders

Consumer loyalty

Research shows that consumer trends are shifting – respondents from the Morning Consult survey indicated that corporate action toward various purpose-driven priorities impacts brand favorability. The rise of the internet and proliferation of social media has enabled near instant transmission of information, public reviews, and increased scrutiny of large organizations. Accordingly, consumers are more informed than ever.

Today, connecting with customers is key to unlocking value and demonstrating purpose. As a result of increased awareness, society has become more attuned to ethical sourcing and the environmental impact of consumption. Purpose-driven customers focus more on environmental and social accountability, caring less about price and status. Consumers are even willing to pay more and change their behavior for brands that get it right. Based on analysis of primary research studies, the IBM Institute for Business Value found that, “on average, 70% of purpose-driven shoppers pay an added premium of 35% more per upfront cost for sustainable purchases, such as recycled or eco-friendly goods. 57% of them are even willing to change their purchasing habits to help reduce negative environmental impact.”

This trend holds true especially for younger generations.

In 2020, Gen-Z will influence 40% of consumer shopping, and they base their purchasing decisions on their social and ethical values.

83% of millennials state they are more loyal to a company that contributes to ESG causes.

To generate loyalty, companies must show they are committed to driving change and understand the environmental and social causes important to their customers. Corporate social responsibility practices can tremendously boost customer loyalty, therefore helping a business demonstrate its purpose to stakeholders.

Companies today are being called upon by their stakeholders to help address some of the world’s most challenging problems, including those concerning economic development and the environment. Corporate social responsibility practices that are well-aligned with corporate purpose can tremendously boost customer loyalty and retention.

Not surprisingly, companies with corporate social responsibility programs show up to a 20% increase in sales, and a 5% increase in customer retention yields a 25-95% increase in profits, articulating how purpose and profit are intertwined more than ever in today’s society.

Employee engagement

Higher employee turnover, changes in workplace environment, and shifting skills requirements accentuate the importance of employee engagement; companies that don’t invest in their workforce risk falling behind.

67% of employees are “not engaged” or “actively disengaged” at work.11

16% of labor costs are attributed to unwanted turnover, according to CFOs, costing companies an estimated $5.2 trillion globally.12

Due to the high cost of recruiting and training talent, the new propensity to switch jobs increases the importance of employee satisfaction and meeting employee expectations. Also, with the rise of remote work, part-time work, and contracting, maintaining team chemistry is increasingly difficult. Consequently, the workplace has become more impersonal.

As articulated in the Morning Consult results, the top priority impacting the likelihood of doing business at a global level is promoting quality jobs and skills, including investing in the future of the workforce. Employee engagement strategies aligned with corporate social responsibility help demonstrate a company’s commitment to promoting the jobs and skills of their employees, thereby directly aligning their business strategy with purpose.

Corporate social responsibility activates employee engagement by infusing meaning and purpose into work. According to a study from charity.org, 86% of surveyed employees expect their employers to provide opportunities to engage in the community, and 87% of surveyed employees expect employers to support causes and issues that matter to those employees.¹³

Reasonably, this research provides an explanation for the $352 million in annual profits lost for the average Fortune 500 company with low engagement scores. Additionally, there is an estimated $2.1 trillion in lost productivity due to disengaged employees each year in the $80 trillion world economy.¹⁴ Finally, 16% of labor costs are attributed to unwanted turnover, according to CFOs¹⁵, costing companies an estimated $5.2 trillion globally.¹⁶

The value of using corporate social responsibility to drive employee engagement cannot be overstated for companies integrating purpose into their operations - employee engagement strategies reduce staff turnover, improve productivity and efficiency, retain customers at a higher rate, and even generate profits.
Stakeholder impact

Data is growing exponentially. Forecasts indicate 10x projected growth of worldwide data from 2017 to 2025\(^1\), which creates many opportunities but also leads to concerns about trust. The explosion of available data puts the onus on businesses to ethically collect data and analyze their impact to serve all stakeholders.

13% of business have identified the tools they need\(^2\) to assess their impact against the United Nation’s sustainable development goals.

$3 trillion estimated value of the global data economy\(^3\) with a 10.4% CAGR.\(^4\)

Currently, companies struggle to structure data, generate insights, and act on their information. Despite the growth in data, only a third of executives at large companies have succeeded in moving their company to a data driven culture.\(^5\)

While these challenges persist, data also creates new opportunities to track and demonstrate social impact. With improved technology and an expectation of detailed reporting, data is expected to deliver value to all stakeholders. Through incorporating corporate social responsibility, companies can leverage data to quantify and demonstrate positive impact and purpose for a growing list of stakeholders.

Corporate social responsibility creates consumer trust

Corporate social responsibility measures aimed at protecting data integrity and transparency are crucial to establishing and fostering trust with stakeholders. Furthermore, analysis shows that typically one-third of corporate profits are at risk from state intervention. Certainly, it is becoming increasingly important for companies to take proactive action towards data responsibility, including promoting data privacy and security.\(^6\)

By gaining trust through integrating corporate social responsibility and establishing a strong purpose aligned with their strategic mission, companies can ease regulatory pressure, achieve greater strategic freedom, and effectively gain a competitive business advantage.

Summary

A growing body of evidence indicates that conducting business with purpose can help to create profits and new opportunities. Truly becoming a socially-conscious company and embedding purpose into organizational strategy can be a challenge since purpose is not one-size-fits-all and may mean different things to different companies based on their mission and values. In order to develop a true and authentic brand value proposition, the purpose driven activities must align tightly with the core mission and value of the company.
